There was once upon a time a free market that was not controlled by fraudsters, loan sharks, and other murderous scum. But though it had no government, it did however have a system of laws and courts, and as long as everyone adhered to those laws and courts, the market worked fairly well. Taxes were collected and saved up for rainy days, and in the best possible world, the people of the market lived in houses with roofs, had food to eat, and a way to get to work. But times were good for the farmers of the market and there was great wealth. And so great wealth led to great greed and one day, the criminals of the market found a way to turn their long-term favor into a profit-making scheme. They formed a gang of thieving magicians and their main trick was to steal from the bank of the market what amounted to a large sum of money, and convert it into gold. The market's farmers were given their full share of the gold, but the magicians took the rest and turned it into coins. The greater the gold they stole, the greater their popularity. As the popularity climbed, it began to attract people who had little care for the laws of the market. The richer the farmers became, the more the people became enriched with the coins they had to invest to get a share of them, and the more greedy they became. Eventually, the rich were so greedy that they looked to expand into other markets and when the law-abiding citizens of a neighboring market saw what was happening,
