* The best place to get Photoshop tutorials and online support for Photoshop is at www.adobe.com/products/photoshop.html. * If you want to create web pages for the web, you might want to try going to www.bidsville.com and creating a web page. You can create a web page that uses your own photos or downloads photos from Flickr (at www.flickr.com), and then add HTML or a graphic editor to it. It's a lot of fun to design a web page with a great picture. Photoshop stores your photos and layers in a file called a `_photoshop document_` (or `_psd file_`). Each document has a specific type of data on it, known as a `_file type_`. With Photoshop you can create more than one type of file, as you'll see in the next section. File types are very important to Photoshop because they decide what you can do with a document. A JPEG file type is the default file format and is described in the next section. There are many other types of files.

For example, you can create RAW files and then later convert them to any other type using a RAW converter. You can access the file types you've created in Photoshop by choosing `File⇒File Type`. The key to properly naming a file type is to understand that the file extension is not the actual type of the file. For example, a JPEG file type is `jpg`, although the file format is described in the `'figures'`. The extension is different, but they both describe the same file type. JPEG files (as the name implies) stands for Joint Photographic Experts Group. It is a file type used for pictures. JPEG files are compressed, so they use a lot less storage space than uncompressed images. You can create JPEG files and save them to the desktop, your hard drive, or any other location. Most digital cameras and cameras for e-mail attachments store JPEG files. The JPEG file format was created to compress the look of images for web and e-mail use. Over the years, the format has evolved to become quite good at compressing images. A JPEG file contains a lot of header information that describes the contents of the file. You won't see much, but the header gives you the raw data of the image contained in the file. If you open up any

Chelsea Manning, who was jailed for leaking sensitive information in 2013, has sued the United States government, seeking $20m (£15m) over claims she was treated brutally in prison. Manning's attorneys argue that she was thrown into solitary confinement and underwent inhumane treatment, including being denied sleep for nine straight days in January 2014. In his ruling, US district judge Denise Casper denied Manning's request for release from solitary confinement, but allowed her release from an adjacent "single-occupancy cell". In testimony before the court, Manning said guards "showed little regard for her health" during her first days in January. After Manning attempted suicide, which she did not disclose, guards went on a "spiteful quest" to target her for revenge, she said, adding that the guards taunted her about her attempted suicide. In June 2013, Manning was detained for six weeks for allegedly violating the US Army's computer use policy after she took a selfie of herself in her underwear. While in custody at the Marine Corps' Quantico base in Virginia, Manning learned that her case would go before the military judge Denise Lind, a former prosecutor for the death penalty. During her detention, she downloaded hundreds of thousands of classified files to her laptop in order to get them to journalists, and also released them to WikiLeaks. Manning's attorneys argue that she was thrown into solitary confinement and underwent inhumane treatment during her first days in January 2014. Photograph: Don Emmert/AFP/Getty Manning, a former US army private, took responsibility for the leaks in her 2013 court-martial in June, and was sentenced to 35 years in prison. She was sentenced to be released on 1 May 2017. While in custody, Manning revealed that she had been diagnosed with gender dysphoria while in the army and had sought to be medically transitioned. The revelations about Manning's treatment became known as the "Manning leaks". Manning's attorneys are arguing that her confinement in Quantico became a "lengthy incommunicado period" while she was held in isolation. They note that the prison offered no access to a telephone or a lawyer. In the lawsuit filed in Maryland federal court on Tuesday, lawyers are seeking $20m in compensation for their client. They argue that the treatment violated Manning ♦

Q: The non-resilience vs. the eco-resilience Eco-resilience is defined as the capability of a system to absorb, accommodate and process disturbance, and then return to a new equilibrium state. The system is "eco" because its status is expressed as the interaction among all the living organisms and the nonliving environment of the biosphere. Ecological resilience describes changes that have long-term positive outcomes for the ecological community as a whole. It is the ability of a system to undergo a sustained change (through regenerative or compensatory processes) and return to the same former state once the disturbance has passed. I have a problem distinguishing between the two concepts. For example, a tsunami is recorded as a disturbance on the "eco-system". But as the level of water rises, the "eco-system" adapts accordingly. This results in the system's restoration to the same pre-tidal state as before the disturbance. So, the process is "ecological", but is it "resilience"? A: Yes, your example is an example of eco-resilience. In general terms, eco-resilience is about the "system" as a whole – the ecosystem itself. It doesn't necessarily mean that the whole system moves to a new equilibrium state, which would be an example of resilience. An example of eco-resilience would be an example of natural selection: For example, the population of certain species of dog will grow very fast and, due to its superior hunting abilities, will out-compete the population of the other species. This reduces the population of the other species, meaning it is less able to hunt and reproduce.

Since the surviving population of
